If the foundation is raft and only max 300mm of made ground to be removed for construction, then the trial trenching would not be needed. I took a precautionary approach as there had been no archaeological mitigation previously and there were no details about foundations (unless I missed them). Also, if the groundworks are limited to the 300mm reduction in the area for the raft foundation then I do not think that mitigation, such as a watching brief during groundworks, would be useful or necessary in this case either.
