Reasons for comment:
Comments:	I reject these planning proposals. I do not believe we should be building on greenbelt areas in a climate crisis. We should first and foremost be building on brown field areas like in Gravesend where they are many areas of land which are derelict and could be built on. The UK is one of the most nature-depleted countries in the world, having lost around half of its biodiversity due to centuries of human activity. In fact a report which number 10 tried to stop being published which was eventually released but redacted warns about the level of National Security risk that nature loss is going to bring to the UK. Costing a 12% loss in GDP by 2030. They area does not have the infrastructure to handle that amount of homes and that would mean even more building of roads, schools etc. This should be a last last resort and not something for property developers to make money off

Kind regards
